

Learning consistently is more important than learning quickly. Small, daily efforts build strong understanding over time and help ideas stay clear. Making mistakes is part of the process and often teaches more than getting things right immediately. Asking questions, revising basics, and practising regularly create confidence. With patience and curiosity, complex topics slowly become familiar, and progress feels natural rather than forced.